Sometimes, when I come across a question, I see it from a different perspective. There is an answer already, and this answer is good, and this answer is also good, but how do they answer the question, if in my opinion the question is asking for a different perspective.

Should I just add my view as an answer for this question? Or should I only answer a question once? A: You should answer questions as you experience them. Be sure to offer an answer that may be helpful to you, and if it's not, answer in a different way. A: You should always try to answer the question as you view it, however if the question was asked from more than one perspective that your answer might answer they multiple different perspectives. Myself, I don't see how your answer to this question is any different than my answer. One would have thought that doing this would help reduce the need for a paper-based, encoding, delivery process to deliver change to their environment. – No, that is not what the author is asking. He's actually asking if there is a way to cache a change made to the schema in a manner that would have allowed that change to be rolled back if the user didn't cache it
